The purpose of this study was to describe how websites in the health domain incorporate user contributions into their information and interaction design. We used a feature analysis approach to identify the feature content on websites that matched a specific set of guidelines for good user interaction. Our analysis was based on publicly available website content from the WHO website. We found a large proportion of websites has already incorporated user contributions into their design. Some websites are closer to providing an optimal user experience than others. These websites incorporate user contributions into their design. They have developed features that allow users to contribute content and have achieved a high level of user engagement. 'The margins of error are fine-tuned in a very specific way. I can divide them down, and I can subdivide them down, but once I do that, there are fewer and fewer, and in one case there's zero. And when I say zero, it would be very, very close to zero,' said the first Department of Homeland Security chief. 'It is that precise that the margins of error are extremely low and they must be respected.'" — Peter Wehner on the dimensions of terrorism and the tolerance for error: "How the West Can Win the War Against Radical Islam," The Washington Post, Jan. 23. AD AD AD "Obama aides can be pretty tin-eared. Some of the people working for the president are not deliberately trying to deceive. They genuinely believe their own nonsense. They think they're doing the right thing." — Peter Baker on the increasingly disastrous attempt by the president's top aides to sell him on the necessity of extending the Sept. 11 terror commission: "The Mission: Finish What Bush

Netanyahu: will not accept Second Lebanon War truce Saturday, April 26, 2006 | by Staff Writer Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Saturday that Israel will not accept a truce in the ongoing eight-day war with Hezbollah, and warned that if his country is pushed into a military retreat at Lebanon's behest, Hezbollah will "dictate the terms of the cease-fire." Netanyahu delivered the defiant remarks to some 1,600 army reservists who have been called up in an emergency to replace reservists who were called up for reserve duty earlier this week. "There will not be a peace with the terror organization Hezbollah," Netanyahu said. "We will not accept a truce, it is not in our interest." Netanyahu went on to warn that his nation has "responsibility for the security of its citizens and for the security of the land of Israel," and said that "This is a struggle of mortal proportions." "Whoever tries to force us into giving up the Golan will be
