EDITING: It is illegal to.Repetition within single trial is impaired by visual working memory load. Repetition of an object within the same trial is a fundamental perceptual skill that is crucial for the integrity of visual perception. The cost of repetition is defined as an increment in the number of errors committed when the same object is presented again during the same trial. The effect of processing load on repetition is debated. It has been argued that visual information can be processed in parallel, leading to a repetition advantage under high-load conditions. In contrast, the repetition deficit has been shown to occur when the perceptual load is high. Recent studies have suggested that an increment of load may impair a visual system that maintains a working memory of the object at stake. The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of load on the processing of object repetition by means of a continuous and arbitrary task. One group of subjects performed a target detection task by searching for a target among distractors that were pictures of numbers; a second group did the same task while performing a recognition memory task that required them to memorize four pictures of numbers. A repetition deficit was measured as the increment in the error rate when the same target was presented within the same trial. We found that the repetition deficit was significantly stronger in the working memory load task than in the target detection task. Our results are in agreement with previous studies of the repetition deficit, and support the idea that the effect of load may be considered a cost of processing load.

Mucinous cystadenocarcinoma of the appendix: a case report. Mucinous cystadenocarcinoma of the appendix is a rare disease that is histologically identical to the common histologic type. It is usually associated with a large non-invasive epithelial neoplasm and a mucinous tumor-producing cyst. The tumor-producing cyst in mucinous cystadenocarcinoma is generally a low-grade mucinous tumor, such as mucinous cystadenoma. We report here a case of mucinous cystadenocarcinoma

China's Embassy in Russia warned on Friday that US trade punitive measures against Beijing could increase "collateral damage" on the global economy and Chinese consumers could "feel the pain" of the blow. The comments come after the United States announced its intention to slap tariffs on imported steel and aluminum, in a move Washington says is designed to protect US national security. “China will have to take necessary measures to safeguard its legitimate rights and interests, and Beijing will firmly safeguard the country’s interests and security and work toward an open and free trade system that is WTO-compatible,” Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Cheng Guoping said at a press conference in Moscow. The vice minister also urged Washington to withdraw its tariff measures. The United States says the measures are in response to the nation’s allegations that China subsidizes its domestic industry. The US Commerce Department released a six-page proposal to impose additional duties on foreign steel and aluminum imports. The proposal will be published in the Federal Register on Monday. The announcement comes after US President Donald Trump said on Sunday that the “trade relationship” between the two countries is “very unsatisfactory.” Cheng said that the move would affect thousands of Russian companies that produce steel and aluminum, which are used in a number of Russia-made products, including cars. “The move may impact the global economy and the consumers’ purchasing power. And therefore, it will have some collateral damage. It is quite possible that the situation will worsen,” the vice minister said.

Zhang Chao, director of the Institute of Developing Economics at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, told the Global Times that the US measures will likely have a “negative effect” on the global economy.
