The malware has infected users in more than 200 countries and infected all the major operating systems including Windows, Mac OS X, Linux, Unix, and Android. Infection is spread by malicious links and attachments on email, including malicious attachments, bogus invitations and spam. The main infection vector is Internet Explorer. Infected users that click malicious links, attachments, and bogus invitations are infected. The malware also hijacks typical browsers search pages and redirects users to fake websites or to pages designed to infect other browsers. The malware also downloads the RAT, Infostealer, and look for files with .vbs, .bat, or .cmd extensions. The trojan is installed in the %Data%Local%Low%Temp folder. The infection process is slow -- usually only lasting a couple of minutes. The malware uses several evasion techniques. First, it tries to check whether we are logged on to a Windows desktop. If we are not logged on, it exits without infecting us. The malware also hides on the target computer after it successfully infects the computer. The malware will slow down the performance of the computer and prevent any remote connections to the infected computer. The malware will then copy itself to the infected computer by disabling its own malware protection and downloading it from the Internet as an executable file. The malware attempts to run various programs by invoking them with specified parameters or with the name of an executable file. The malware will also use the comand.com command to run a program. All Internet users should immediately apply this patch.
