As I mentioned before, the iPad Pro is equipped with a retina display, which I guess is the cutoff point for what most graphic designers consider high-resolution displays. Content creators want more real estate with their design work, and hence the iPad Pro, made official in September, delivers an additional dimension of productivity, freedom and creativity. It is of course a very different working experience and it is not the iPad Pro that let's Photoshop do the real work. Rather, it's the new and improved Adobe Camera Raw and Adobe Lightroom, and Photoshop Sketch. And when I look at the other apps on watchOS, I immediately think that Apple is making headway into the business and productivity area by giving us the pen and an on-screen keyboard. In many respects, the whole aspect of the iPad Pro is extremely interesting, simply because it is just so new to us. No one knows what all of the potentials are. You have example cases where the iPad Pro is essentially a drawing and editing platform, as well as others where the iPad Pro is more like a laptop. However, there can be no doubt that, as the reviews are already saying , the iPad Pro is already in its first marketing phase. That's why I will stick to my earlier warning and let you be the judge. The question is whether or not you want to spend the money on one. If you are an existing iPad or iPhone user and you are not looking for an investment, give it some serious thought. The new Module panel allows you to organize your photos and batches of photos inside folders. Folders help you keep track of the individual steps or processes used to create your best shots. You can make a folder for a specific project or for a group of people who need to collaborate. By using this panel, you can further organize your photo library even more efficiently.

The new Photoshop Creative Cloud subscription is also now available in a few new regions as part of our global expansion.
